

The trait Eli Bebleh has, which I've observed in players that have excelled in high school, and continued their baseball careers in college - is the inner drive to improve themselves when nobody is watching. This trait goes back to his younger days - utilizing the time off during the pandemic shut downs to lift, train and work at his craft to take advantage of the time as an opportunity to set the foundation to build upon through his high school years.

Eli is a natural athlete - fast and strong at an early age, and has blossomed during his high school years. Many kids with natural ability can get by with raw talent, but he continues to put in the work to get the most out of what he has.

The inner drive, hustle, and self confidence Eli has, will carry him to success on the baseball field, classroom and in life. He comes from a very supportive family, and is a respectful, encouraging teammate. Eli's passion for baseball, inner drive to develop, and as a 'team first' player, would be a positive addition to any collegiate program.

A handwritten signature in black ink, appearing to read 'R. Yamamoto', with a long horizontal flourish extending to the right.

Reid Yamamoto
Eli's Youth Baseball Coach